

CHUWEN

MEASURE OF INSOURCIANCE

Chuwen, is the daysign of the Monkey. This is the nawal of all arts and the artists—and as such, Chuwen is the patron daysign of all creative expression, endeavor and achievement. It is often referred to as the "weaver of time," and is considered to be the best day to be married.

Out of the mouth of Do'carib'ole, the river god, come these words: "The monkey had so much going for it. We are astounded by the way they managed to turn out. Regard them at their best, seek out where the children of all ages, as their monkey ancestors, play and cavort."

While from the river of the mouth god flow these: a "docile boar" could "dare bi cool" and "abide color" while the "ale bird coo" an "acid bolero". Few presume to understand the mouth god.

So much can be learned from a species at play. It should not take you long to see their jealousy of your kind manifest: they desire to be amphibious. For them, the sea is a playground or a source for food, but it can never be, as for you, home. Even their simplest and most pure desires are mitigated; they build a wall between the land and the sea. They want to play in the sea, but suffer from the delusion that they can control and define it. They can never find harmony with the natural forces as you have by simply being at home wherever you go.

How much of this harmony will you manage to retain if you prove your worthiness and are in the monkey's place next time around?
